PRESIDENT XI JIN PING'S GRAND PLAN FOR CHINA: STAND BY FOR MORE SHOCK ANNOUNCEMENTS !

But It Will Be, After All, Only A Temporary Distraction

If one is of the opinion that the drive to stamp out corruption in the People's Republic of China (PRC) has hit a high point, think again!

Because, in the opinion of this medium, that which one is led to believe today, via the various, multifaceted 'propaganda ministries' of the Middle Kingdom, is just the beginning.

And the single, most-visible person, who is leading the charge behind the well-publicised, anti-corruption drive in the country, is Mr Xi Jin Ping ().

Mr Xi Jin Ping is the General Secretary of The Communist Party of China, the President of the PRC, as well as being the Chairman of the Central Military Commission.

He is, without question, the most-powerful man in the country whose human population is said to be not less than 1.30 billion people.

As the economy of the country sinks from one level to a lower level, one may expect that more heads will roll on the political altar of expedience.

At English Common Law, there is that which is termed, 'The Common Enemy Syndrome'.

This, simple put, is a rule that states that one is entitled to take whatever action(s) is deemed necessary with little to no regard of one's neighbour, or the effects of such action(s) on one's neighbour, as long as that action(s) is deemed in accordance with Natural Law.

The concept of Natural Law is, in simple terms, that certain rights and values, ingrained in the constitution or in the essential character of human nature, are universally recognisable through the reasoning power of right-minded people.

There is the mythical story of a gigantic missile that was discovered, unexpectedly, in the middle of a farmer's field and, from the inside the missile, there was a very audible, tic-toc, tic-toc.

When the missile was first discovered, there arose a great fear among the populace of this rural area.

In due course, it was held that the missile must have been fired by the enemy and that, at any time, it could explode, causing widespread deaths among the populace and general havoc, throughout the country.

Nobody appeared to have an answer to the conundrum as to how to dismantle the missile; and, fear spread, throughout the land as a direct consequence.

Full time and attention was, then, paid by the most-learned scientists of the day in studying an alternative method to disarm this lethal weapon – as it came to be known, generally – but, once again, fear provoked dread should the tic-toc, tic-toc stop, suddenly.

The time and attention that were spent in trying to find a solution to the problem of the missile was to the detriment of all other security considerations and, before long, the matter of the enemy, at large and on the country's doorstep, was, almost completely, relegated to the pages of history.

The Application of The Common Enemy Syndrome

The PRC Government of today is well cognisant of its faltering economy, but, thus far, it has been unable to find a solution as to what, really, ails the country.

All cosmetic, Governmental acts of artificiality have had little to appreciable effect.

In an attempt to appease the masses, it appears that the people in power have discovered the 'common enemy' in their midst: Perceived and real corruption at the highest levels of Government and, massive corruption in select private enterprises.

With regard to the corruption in select private enterprises, it is maintained that these enterprises are among the many sources of 'feeding' corruption at various levels of Government servants.

As a result, nobody in the PRC, today, is safe: Everybody is fair game to those who are empowered to seek and root out alleged corrupt practices in the country.

When the populace of the country becomes tired of learning that this person or that person, this religious person or that leader of an illegal cult, or the heads of this enterprise or that enterprise have been found guilty of corrupt practices, then, Phase Two is triggered, with President Xi Jin Ping, claiming that the people of the country must be loyal to the edicts of The Communist Party of China, the legal ruling, political party of the country.

Phase Two could well be labelled, in time, as blind nationalism: Love of one's country, right or wrong.

When, after a convenient period of time, the economy of the PRC starts to recover, it will be held that the people were responsible for the about-turn, with President Xi Jin Ping, having simply executed the demands of his people, he, being sworn to defend them, come what may.

The matter of the 'missile in the farmer's field' will have been relegated to history – once again.

The Power and The Glory

President Xi Jin Ping is well-accepted, today, as being the most-powerful person in the PRC.

There can be no question of that fact.

He is the country's major-domo, at least the people of the country are being told, directly and indirectly.

He is dominant in all political decisions of materiality, those decisions, having been brought to the fore by this relatively 'new broom' in Chinese politics.

After all, is it not so that a new broom sweeps the cleanest?

In order to stimulate blind nationalism, far and wide within the country, rallies have to be conducted, in one form or another, with President Xi Jin Ping, sending in his minions to rouse the people to love their country and its legally appointed leaders.

Speeches have to be made, from time to time, in order to explain the necessity to the people of the many sacrifices that are necessary to be made in the interests of the common good.

After all, misery does love company, does it not?

The many determinations of the learned justices of PRC courts in respect of cases of corrupt practices by Government servants and/or private enterprises, members of the country's legal fraternity, etc, have become among the many voices where the decision-making policies of the President has proved to have borne fruit – all in the interests of the country.

The requirement to safeguard the country, its people, as well as its sovereign rights with regard to outlying territories, such as tiny disputed islands, have, of late, become a matter of international interest.

And so, in the PRC's national interests, arming the 'handkerchief' islands that, in the past, were deemed too small to be of any real concern to the Politburo, is today's talking point in the Western World.

More fiery rhetoric will be forthcoming in the coming months in this regard, no doubt.

Provoking disputes with neighbours over alleged historic land grabs have become commonplace, these days, especially in respect of Vietnam.

But President Xi Jin Ping will, always, maintain that all of the country's actions are legal, correct and proper, and in the best interests of the national security of the country.

With one of the largest militias on the face of the earth, President Xi Jin Ping will not hesitate to employ strident rhetoric in his dealings with the West should the PRC be taken to task.

Relations with the West, most likely, will become impaired, temporarily, but, as far as President Xi Jin Ping is concerned, it will be in the interests of directing the focus of the common man from economic problems on the home front.

When the about-turn is confirmed, again, politics to the fore.

In the wake of his master plan, in order to distract the people from the economic situation that exists in the country, today, President Xi Jin Ping will locate and, if considered convenient, eliminate those who might try to unseat him or to thwart his plans.

Politics may well be the defined as the art of compromise, but the elimination of political foes is much faster than trying to map out the direction of compromise.

In view of all that is happening in the world, today, from civil wars to the swarms of refugees, landing on European shores by the tens of thousands, the PRC, which remains the world's second-largest economy, still harbours the best chance for a determined, economic revival, internationally, and, as such, the West will just have to learn to live with President Xi Jin Ping's master plan for his country, love it or learn to lump it.
